Reinhardt and Gumbel are located near the Dutch frontier. Each had a population of 2,000 before the war.

NEW YORK, April 22.—American troops have fought at Houthouven their first battle of the war, and have come through the engagement with victory.

All previous attacks by the Germans against the American positions in east France have been made or recommended for the purpose of securing information for use in Houthouven. The assault, this week-end at Houthouven, however, was not of this character. It showed every evidence of having been an attempt by Houthouven to seize permanently the village held by the Americans, and to improve the German position, according to that part of General Pershing's line.

Failure to accomplish this purpose was complete. The official Berlin report that the Germans destroyed "no work" in the American positions was unimportant, in view of the fact that the Germans were forced back to their own line. The purpose of Houthouven to consolidate the American position with the German front is sufficiently indicated by the action of the Germans in retreating over night in the American positions they had temporarily occupied.

It is assumed that the Americans made a strategic retirement before the initial rush of the Germans, either because the German force was largely superior in numbers, or because a German barrage fire gave indications of cutting off the Americans. The counter attack of Pershing's fighters demonstrated conclusively that the original retirement, however, was well
